He was arrested soon after his arrival. Meanwhile, the work on the tunnel was delayed, and the innocent looking people in the little house near the railroad were disturbed by the report that the Czar had started for home. There was nothing to do but try the mine in its incomplete state, and with a small charge, or see the work wasted. All the conspirators but Sophie Petrovsky, and.

All communications should be addressed to "Gazette," identified in New York in a soap pedler. He has been making a poor living in that way for months, but under an assumed name, and quite unknown to the police; but he was tempted to make a speech in the recent meeting denunciatory of Secretary-of-State Bayard for arranging a treaty with Russia to extradite assassins of czars, and recognition has ensued. He is short and slight, and of a nervous temperament. He usually wears a full blonde beard, and when he first came to America he dressed well and tastily. At present he is inclined to the unkempt shabbiness that distinguishes most of the radical agitators when they have not been refined by the regular habits of prison life. Hartmann talks freely about the events that led to his flight to this country. He had not been in New York long before he found himself compelled to keep quiet, for a bard attempt was made to bring an attempt upon the Czar's life under the head of the extraditable laws. Hartmann's friends maintained that he had to flee from Russia on account of a political offence that his attempt to remove the Czar was but a part of the acknowledged programme of a polical party. And so it was, but there is no knowing just how the affair might have turned out could Hartmann have been found when the courts were asked to make a pre-cedent on the case. Never did hunted man disappear so completely, and while police and detectives were scouring the East Side for him, he was amusing himself by learning English and reading editorial comment on himself in Mr. Swinton's library. When the chase was abandoned, for it was plain that the government would hesitate, if not rethe government would hesitate, if not re-fuse to surrender Hartmann, the nihilist re-turned to the light, but he did not make much fuss about it. He says that his at-tempt upon the Czar's life was the fourth that enduring monarch escaped. The eighth killed him. Hartmann's effort occurred in November, 1879. A little more than a year before he had escaped from prison where he was confined for his political opinions. The policy of terrorism was originated and inof its first expounders. After two or three futile efforts the revolutionary party, which was centered at St. Petersburg, deemed it advisible, on account of the growing severi-ty of the police, to break up and, scatter its members through the country. Hartmann went to a village on the Volga, where not long after a secret congress of the revolutionists was held. The organization was strengthened in various ways, one of which was the election of a supreme council of three persons. This council had absolute control over the members, and all were bound to do its bidding without question. At its head was a woman, Sophie Perovsky, since executed for complicity in the successful attempt upon the Czar. Hartmann was elected a member of the next highest au-

St. Petersburg to examine the system of canals there with a view to utilizing them in some way. It was found impracticable on account of the nature of the soil. His highness was at that time in the Crimea, and the nihilists, accordingly, sent out searchers everywhere to determine by what route the Czar would return home. When it was learned that he would take passage over the Great Southern Railway, they bought a small house near the track, just outside the city of Moscow. Hartmann and Sophie Perovsky, who pretended to be his wife, lived there and secreted with them a number of their fellow-conspirators. They had 150 feet of tunnel to construct in order to get under the railway track. The difficulties of the task may be imagined when it is considered that it had to be done with the utmost secrecy. A transverse section of the tunnel was thirty-six inches broad at the Granite Monuments, Headstones, base and forty six inches high, triangular in shape. The miners had got within seven
